The problem of legal regulation of the Family Code of the Russian Federation is highly relevant nowadays.

The problem is crucial for ensuring the protection and well-being of families and children in the country. It is essential to address the current challenges and gaps in the legal system to promote the values of equality, justice, and respect for human rights.

To identify problems in family legislation, it is worth referring to the Family Code of the Russian Federation, where we will see the main problems of its regulation:

- There is a lack of clarity and consistency in family law provisions, which can lead to confusion and legal uncertainty for individuals and families. Some provisions are vague and open to interpretation, while others may be contradictory or inconsistent with other laws or international norms.

- Family law in Russia does not provide adequate protection for vulnerable groups such as women, children, and elderly people. For example, there is no specific law against domestic violence, and the protection of women and children in cases of divorce and child custody disputes is often inadequate.

- Also, Family law does not provide adequate recognition and protection for non-traditional families such as same-sex couples, unmarried couples, and blended families. This can lead to discrimination and legal challenges for these families, particularly in cases of child custody and inheritance.

- Nowadays, access to legal services is regularly limited for individuals and families in Russia, particularly for those from low-income or marginalized communities. This can make it difficult for individuals to navigate the legal system and enforce their rights under family law.

- Even when court decisions are made in family law cases, there may be inadequate enforcement mechanisms in place to ensure that the decisions are actually carried out. This can lead to ongoing legal disputes and frustration for individuals and families seeking resolution of their legal issues.

To solve these problems, the government can amend, update or revise existing family laws to address the gaps and failures that exist in the current legal framework or introduce new laws that focus on addressing gaps in family relations and regulating family law matters as they arise in society.

Also ensuring that people get involved in the legal process by providing opportunities to raise their voices and opinions can help to identify gaps in the family law system that need to be addressed.

Our government can adopt successful family law practices from other nations that have undergone similar legal challenges and reforms. Educating people about their family law rights and responsibilities can be helpful in addressing gaps in the system and other ways to solve the problems of current regulation of law, which will most effectively ensure the normal functioning of this industry.
